Más allá de buenos o malos padres: La diversidad en la búsqueda de ayuda de los padres

Carolina González

Raising children, girls, and adolescents is a labor that is gratifying, but also challenging. Fortunately, we have evidence-based interventions available for parents in several countries. However, low participation rates are commonly reported, and it is important to know how we can incentive parents to participate in these interventions when this support is available. Given that intention to participate is a predictor of later participation, we evaluated the relationship between parenting cognitions and behaviours and parents' intention to participate in parenting interventions. Findings showed that those parents who reported more intention to participate reported greater difficulties in their parenting, but also there were parents used positive strategies such as praise. Thus, these findings indicate that those parents who perceive difficulties and those who are using positive parenting can show interest to participate in parenting interventions. This study demonstrate that it is possible to promote parenting support for all parents.
